

WILLIAM JEFFERSON CLINTON

May 27, 2009

I am pleased to congratulate the members of the Special Libraries Association as you mark your 100th anniversary.

America draws great strength from the success and longevity of groups such as yours. From the time of your organization's founding, it has strived for excellence in your profession, advanced the interests and goals of your members, and worked to create a culture that values knowledge.

You can take great pride in SLA's record of achievement. Starting well before the advent of computers and electronic records and taking us through the Information Age, SLA has worked to ensure that both its members and the public have the tools they need to broaden their knowledge and their horizons. I am confident that your dedication to professional growth and education will continue to serve you and the global community well in the years ahead.

Best wishes for a memorable anniversary celebration.
